In this case the facts certainly demonstrate that a change in the constitution of the medium, of such a character as to affect the metabolic processes, brings about a change in the localization of a specific organ, the pharynx. Another case which involves not merely localization but number of parts as well, concerns the eye-spots. Normally two eyespots, symmetrically placed, appear in Planaria in regulation as well as in ontogeny. As noted above, however, we find that short pieces in water, especially those from the middle region of the body, often give rise to only one median eye-spot. In fact the formation of a single eye-spot instead of two is the first indication of decreased or incomplete ability to form a head. If we compare pieces of different lengths with anterior ends at the same level of the body we find that with decreasing length of piece single eye-spots appear more frequently, until in pieces of a certain length perhaps only single eye-spots are formed. With still further decrease in the length of the pieces the heads with single eye-spots give way to a headless condition. It should be noted, however, that the relation between the length of the piece and the character of the result is by no means constant, but is dependent on the length of the animal, the physiological condition and various other factors. In shorter individuals, for example, a relatively larger fraction, though an...
